

Free Help For Those Taking Care Of Elderly Loved Ones

(StatePoint) Almost everyone knows someone older who needs a helping hand. And with the U.S. population aging and experiencing increasing numbers of age-related diseases like Alzheimer's, more people are becoming unofficial "caregivers" to elderly friends, relatives and neighbors.

But taking care of a loved one can be far from simple. Studies show that many caregivers already work full-time and live more than an hour from the person for whom they care. Trying to coordinate medical appointments, monitor and fill prescriptions, and manage insurance claims can be daunting.

In fact, there are between five and seven million Americans currently caring for loved ones who live more than one hour away, according to research from the National Alliance for Caregiving and AARP. This makes it difficult for caregivers to find local resources and manage the person's care remotely, as well as communicate information to healthcare professionals, family, and friends.

Fortunately, for the scores of remote caregivers who are in this difficult situation, there is a free new service called ShirleyBOARD.com. The web site enables caregivers to centrally store important information, keep a log of daily activities, and network with other caregivers. Caregivers decide who has access to certain information. ShirleyBOARD.com's most popular feature is the journal which even has a "tagging" feature so you can quickly retrieve journal entries on particular topics.

"There are approximately six million Americans serving as long-distance caregivers for elderly parents and relatives, while also trying to care for their own immediate families and maintain full-time jobs," said ShirleyBOARD.com's founder Mark Willaman. "That's why I launched ShirleyBOARD.com as a free service to help caregivers stay organized, better communicate with others involved in the older person's care, and find a local resource for a patient -- like a doctor, home health agency or handyman -- even if they aren't familiar with a patient's hometown."

And Willaman speaks from experience. He currently lives in California while providing long-distance care to his aging New Jersey-based mother, Shirley, after whom the new service is named.

I took mom to see Dr. Williamson this morning. Her blood work was really good so no new medications are needed at this point.

He is considering increasing her memory loss medication but he will not make a decision until he sees her at her next appointment in three months. We made an appointment to see the doctor on June 3, 2007 at 4pm. The appointment will be downtown at Emmanual Hospital.

The doctor made specific note that mom was quite upbeat and had an outstanding overall attitude. I told him that I had definitely been noticing the same thing and thought it was because we were getting outside and doing a lot more activities. He agreed that staying busy is a real important part of mom's overall caregiving plan.

This visit was probably our best one in the past few months. We walked away feeling very upbeat and celebrated by going to Mom's favorite Italian restaurant downtown...

Those caring for elderly relatives can now share and organize information online.

communicating, Willaman also wanted the site to help caregivers overcome another challenge: keeping organized.

Caring properly for a loved one often requires a caregiver to stay on top of a mountain of records -- legal files, medical information, doctors' numbers, and more. Consequently, ShirleyBOARD.com offers a number of ways to organize and share information, including a virtual "pill box" for keeping prescription records and a personal medical contact database.

While the features are private, ensuring that no one else can access the caregiver's files, users can choose to share items from their journals or records. This gives caregivers another way to locate each other and discuss specific treatments, prescriptions, or other aspects of caregiving.

The site also offers helpful articles, an online calendar, photo sharing, and an alert feature that immediately updates friends, healthcare professionals and others on new events or changes in your journal. The alerts work instantly, and without going through email, avoiding the problem of missed phone calls or updates getting buried in inbox spam.

While ShirleyBOARD.com is still rather new, Willaman said he's pleased it's already helping caregivers get organized, communicate better and find help and support in taking care of their loved ones.
